

When both leisure and domesticity exist in fully public space, the home dissolves into the collective environment. Eating, resting, and recreation become shared acts, erasing traditional boundaries of privacy and ownership in favour of constant social interaction and communal living.