

When both leisure and domestic life are contained within private spaces, the home becomes a self-enclosed world. Interaction, rest, and recreation happen away from the public realm, creating an intimate environment where boundaries are drawn not between work and leisure, but between the home and everything beyond it.